A New Sky-Writing Machine

Secret Of How It Works Known

A man going home from work grumbled up at the sky, stopped dead, and looked back at his house. He picked up his pen and wrote on the sky.

He wrote on the sky without any visible means of support, was called "Hello" in thirty seconds.

It was on King street, Toronto, where he walked, turned, and looked at a 12-foot high question mark on the sky. Then, flashing across the blackness of the southern sky appeared a gigantic "Hello" "New York".

They aghed the group of men two steps up, on the roof. They saw the question-marking contraption those men seemed to be operating, and later saw the white of a high-powered generator.

It was the sky-writing machine, a bewitching contraption of thin mirrors and strong lights capable of throwing words high against the heavens.

Up on the roof, Gordon C. Edwards could have told him he had been working on the idea for 20 years. The machine is the final outcome of a series of experiments begun in 1910, and the secret of how it works is being brought to light in the new book, "The Sky-Writer," by Mr. Edwards.

He said the rays of light, passing through the lenses and a metal screen, are then reflected from a mirror, are erected high in the sky, with atmospheric humidity serving as a background.

"It doesn't depend on clouds, in fact, clouds are a handicap," he said. "Foggy which would throw messages on fog or cloud backs were vented back in the 1880s, but they were ineffectual. This machine works best in a clear night when the humidity is fairly high. But we've been on an improved basis and will overcome all handicaps and work practically every time in the year."

"The military authorities are tremendously," he declared. "The signals branch of the army made the machine the secret of the British government, but it is not, is believed to be in contact with air corps production work."

A clever blase

Fans Highly Educated

Most Of Them Can Speak Two Or More Languages

Ninety-nine of every 100 Finns are well educated, but only a few are bilingual.

Finland's high literacy was much to religion. During the Reformation movement of the 16th century, the Finnish Protestant Church wanted Finns to be able to study the scriptures in their own language and other religious books. Hence the movement to educate the people.

Today many Finns are said to be able to speak in Finnish that in any other language.

Bookstore in Helsinki is reported to have sold more than 500,000,000 copies of mail were handled in the Finnish language. The Finnish language is the most widely spoken in the world.
